On Monday, the board approved a $746,000 increase for the current fiscal year. And now, Longwell isn’t budging. He took issue with the city’s continued effort to get out of paying more than a million dollars from March, when the county executive ordered the move to adjust the county’s Medicaid reimbursement rates. “We came to understand from the city attorney, and the U.S. attorney’s office, that this was a bad idea, that the courts would not enforce this, and we believed that it was a bad idea,” Longwell said. “And we were frankly advised by the city’s lawyer that the city was not going to pay it, and we didn’t want to get into this business where we were operating under the direction of a city, through their lawyer, that we should not pay the money.” The county’s reimbursement to the state for Medicaid services is based on the amount of money the city pays its municipal employees. What Longwell and the board said is the city was actually paying the county more than $3 million per year, he said, which is the reimbursement rate plus additional costs. “And I just thought it was something we ought to do,” Longwell said. “For all these years, the city has been billed for Medicaid at the rate that it would take to pay its municipal employees, and that's about $3 million a year. And we believed that Medicaid was intended to be managed on a cost 6a5afdab4c
