Source: Can/Should I be using a javascript library for animations? I've been taught to not use javascript frameworks for animations, but I am having difficulty believing this when something like jquery does so much more than just animations. So if someone tells me it's bad practice to use a framework and I was taught to do something else, I'd like to be able to defend why my method isn't bad practice. A: So if someone tells me it's bad practice to use a framework and I was taught to do something else, I'd like to be able to defend why my method isn't bad practice. Nobody would tell you it's bad practice to use a framework, they would just tell you not to use a framework. Frameworks have their place, and this is not one of them. A: Framework's are great when you want to do something quickly. That's the purpose of using them. There's no real benefit to using a framework for code that doesn't perform extra function. Traditionally, conventional remote devices, such as remote control devices, are usually stationary. A user will use his/her wireless remote control device to achieve his/her intended operation at the stationary remote device. In doing so, the user often needs to know the location of the remote device and then the user must move to the location of the remote device to operate the remote device. For example, if the remote device is a television device, the user may be at his/her office, and may wish to connect to the television device. It may be inconvenient for the user to move to a remote location to achieve the desired connection with the remote device. As such, there is a need for further improvement in the relevant art.When
